Question 2B (20 marks)Read the text below.

There was once a big old house in the middle of a sugar estate. It belonged to the estate owner and it was a beautiful house. It had a huge garden with a small lake in the middle. With time, however, the house started falling to pieces. The owner had died and, as his son had gone abroad, there was no one to look after it. The tiles on the roof were falling off, the window panes were broken and the garden started looking like a jungle.

The villagers who lived near the house were quite superstitious and they were afraid of ghosts. They said that they heard strange noises coming from the house at night. The villagers were afraid to go anywhere near it. They were convinced that the place was haunted!

One day, the owner's son came back from England with his family. As he wanted to live in the family home again, he decided to renovate it. When the villagers heard the news, they wanted to warn him that the house was haunted but they did not have the courage to do so. They were sure that something terrible would happen. However, the work went on smoothly and the house looked beautiful again.

At last, the villagers took courage and told the young man about the house being haunted. He listened to them and then replied: "Don't worry. All the broken windows have been repaired. The house has been cleaned and painted. All the wild cats and rats have been chased away. Since then, we have not heard any strange noise in the house."

The villagers went away, disappointed. Without a haunted house, life in the village would be less interesting!
