On May 20, 1975, thousands of Mauritian students protested against injustice in the education system, especially the inequalities between public and private schools. This event remains a turning point in the history of Mauritius. It demonstrates how collective action can lead to deep and lasting change.

On May 19, thousands of students from various public and private schools gathered outside the Ministry of Education to protest against deep inequalities in the system. On May 20, they organised a historic march towards Port Louis. As they reached the Grand River North West (GRNW) bridge, police blocked their way. Violent clashes erupted, with tear gas, batons, and stones being used. Protesters staged a 10-day hunger strike that drew public attention. This movement paved the way for key educational reforms such as free secondary education in 1976.
